

The article presents the evolution of meteorological observations known to have been made for thousands of years ago and up to the present day, when the transition is made from classical equipment and human knowledge, to automatic and autonomous stations, with sensors that measure with greater accuracy the main meteorological parameters data necessary to describe the atmosphere at a given moment, but which also represent the input data for the numerical models and thus to the forecast.